

disappeared about 10 or 12 years ago, that when she left she owed him a bill of $14.00. He then looked over some old account books with his daughter and found an entry which showed that Mrs. Easton's account was dated Feb. 16, 1914 and had a balance of $14.10 unpaid. It was about this time that Mrs. Easton disappeared. He added that he had not seen her since. He further stated that she lived here with a man named Easton who he (Silverstein) believed to be her Husband and a small boy about 12 years of age and a small girl about 10 or 11 years old. Mrs. Easton occupied rooms in the 2 upper floors of the building that she often brought a customer to his store and would speak German to him (Silverstein) and told him to charge over his regular price for the article bought so that she (Easton) could make a little commission on the customer which he often did turning the money over to Mrs. Easton. He remarked that she is a wise business woman and made a lot of money bringing customers to him but that he would not believe anything she would say, that she used to drive a horse and wagon and go out into the country parts around Trenton and buy up furniture, that she had a mule and the boy often rode this mule around the streets, that she seemed to be the boss, that her husband helps around the store and has very little to say, that he (Silverstein) had many business transactions with her. I asked him if he had ever heard of a murder on the Pennington Road and he replied that he never had. He remarked that Mrs. Easton was a great talker and often talked in German to him and that he could identify her if he saw her, that her husband appeared to be much older than she, that she rented the building at 338 South Broad Street from an agent who has since died the property being owned by the Chambers Estate of New York.

Operative also interviewed a Mrs. Nicholas Stillwell of 402 South Broad Street who stated that on the 8th day of May 1913 she moved to her present address and opened up the Grocery store she now conducts, that at that time she had too much furniture for the rooms in the back of the store and decided to sell
